dopted the Dutch process, which, after hundreds of years experience, has proved acid for a long period. Into the bottom of earthen pots or crocks is poured weak vinegar, made by diluting acetic acid, about a quart in each pot; sheets of lead (commonly cast in round lattice work shapes called puckles, about the size of a tea plate) are placed in the pots, ten of these weighing about ten pounds, being placed in each pot, resting on shoulders above, but not in contact with the vinegar. Being thus prepared they are placed together in successive layers stacks, about eighteen feet square. Each layer is covered with boards and then with spent ten bark, or stable litter, the heat from which causes the vinegar to ferment, and this starts the process of corrosion. Each stack usually contains from twenty to twenty-five tons of lead in from four thousand to five thousand pols. At the and of about three months the stacks are ever in Wellington. opened and the carbonated lead emptied in to the separating machinery, which separates the corroded lead from that not coroded. The carbonate is then deposited b elevators in tanks, where it is thoroughly washed to remove any discoloration; it is then ground in a pastry state under French burr stones; next pumped into tanks and allowed to settle. After a few days it is placed on copper pans heated by steam, and dried; it is then the dry white lead of commerce. Then it is mixed with linseed oil in proportion of alue parts by weight of oil, lead, and finished by grinding. By the Datch process of corroding, white lead contains more oxide of lead, and possesses greater covering power or body than when made by any other process. For Sale in Wellington by
